But at the end of two days our lawyer was homesick for the court. He set out, therefore, to survey the court of heaven, staring at the passers-by as he had formerly done in the hall of Pas Perdu, in order to place his hand upon a good client.

"A cause! a cause! I must have a cause!" said he, clenching his flats. "It want a cause! ought I to plead for nothing!" But all the passers had a joyous air which hardly denoted passers and a joyous air which hardly denoted the preoccupations of chicanery. He was dis-mayed—furious. All at once he espied a young woman clothed in long morning robes, who, with eyes cast down and melancholy brow, walked slowly along, leading a child by the hand.
